

April 19, 2046

Dear my love,

Dear my love,

This is one of the hardest letters I've ever written to you. I keep thinking about how our relationship went, and I guess I can not put up with this anymore. I believe our last real conversation was 3 months ago, but it seems like I cannot recognize you anymore...

At first, when you told me that you were going to find an AI therapist to cure your mental health, I was so happy and proud that you finally cared about your own feelings, and more than that, my feelings. But gradually, I feel like I was losing you, like the REAL you.

I miss the time when we argued, you said everything that came to your mind so that I could understand you, although sometimes these words hurt me a lot. I miss the time when you did not know how to show me your care, even though you care so deeply. I complained about it to you, and you just tried to listen to me and tried to fix your actions clumsily. And I miss the time when we spent time together. You laughed, in an annoying way, but I kinda love it, and you were just being YOU. You tried to tease me, hugged me so tight that I could not breathe, and said that you loved me like you actually meant it, not like you had practiced it.

But I guess things changed, you're still you, but somewhere along the way, it stopped being you talking to me. Now it's reports, summaries, and conclusions.

"Based on my emotional patterns, I think what I'm feeling is..."

"My therapist suggests that this conflict stems from..."

"It would be healthier for both of us if..."

Do you hear it?

There's no hesitation anymore. No mess. No contradiction. No you, just a robot sound, and you're the one who creates it. You even started trusting its suggestions more than what you felt with me.

When you said your therapist flagged our relationship as 'unstable', it was my last straw. I miss when you didn't know what you felt, when you said the wrong thing and had to take it back. When silence meant you were thinking, not waiting for your AI therapist to generate a perfect response to me.

I don't want a partner who always responds correctly. I want someone who responds honestly—even if it's late, or confusing, or a little unfair.

It feels like you've outsourced the hardest parts of being human, and those were the parts I loved you for.

So it's time for us to separate a little bit. I need to process my feelings. It's not because you have changed, but because I don't know if you're still here anymore.

Your love,

Tina

Tina Morrison

